Would the price of clothing and coal have been cut had the time for selling not been reduced by the weather? Hardly. But thanks to the weather thousands of poor people have been able to weather it through the winter without begging or stealing. Coal has dropped $3 to $3.50 the ton in St.*Louis and if the moderate temperature is maintained for a short time only, a further tumble in price may be looked for but will it reach the country? If reports from many who live in the cities are to be relied on, living is cheaper there than in the small country towns. What is the reason for such a condition, transportation of food stuffs from the country to the cities imperative? Has competition anything to do with the matter or rather, lack of competion? We think so, yet few who retained their normal senses would think of embarking at this time in mercantile pursuits when those trained for years are having to exercise every whit of their business ability to prevent losses greater than they could sustain and continue in business. Volume of business means a lot, but if losing the more trade the greater the loss it would appear, except in cases where stocks must be purged of shop-worn or other named or described defendants, greetstuff which when style changes, become worthless, practically.
